COLOUR AND GRAIN

This product is created through a fuming (ammonia) process, where the resulting darker colour depends on the natural tannin content of the oak—higher tannin levels produce deeper tones. Because tannin varies between trees, even within the same forest, fumed products naturally display more colour variation than stained finishes, but provide a warmer, more characterful appearance that enhances the natural beauty of the wood. Boards must be well-mixed during installation to achieve a balanced overall look. Natural variation between oak species and grades also contributes to the overall character, with features such as longer rays, occasional crotches, swirls, burls, and the plumed or flared grain patterns typical of plain-sawn boards. You will also find natural knots, cracks, and structural features that have been professionally repaired and filled to ensure stability while maintaining the authentic rustic appearance. This inherent diversity in colour and grain texture is expected and forms an integral part of the product's aesthetic.
